ABSTRACT

An event, such as a security-related event, is received from a first security engine or another source. A second security engine is identified that is configured to utilize information contained in the event. The information contained in the event is then communicated to the second security engine. Additionally, other information, such as system state information, can be provided to one or more security engines.